Join one of Europe's leading centres for the study of archaeology.

Archaeology has been part of the fabric of the University of Edinburgh since the 19th century. Our archaeology department has a dynamic, internationally recognised research profile with projects encompassing a broad geographical and chronological spread.

Our archaeology programmes provide strong transferable skills and training, preparing you for a professional role in archaeology, or further study in the subject. The School itself has excellent facilities, including dedicated study space, archaeological and computing laboratories, and teaching and reference collections.

The city of Edinburgh is ideal for archaeological study and research, allowing you to benefit from national and local institutions and heritage agencies, such as the excellent archaeological collections of the National Museum of Scotland, the archival and bibliographic resources of Historic Environment Scotland, and the presence of staff in several commercial archaeology companies.
